

Wilfrid Laurier University

Scholars Commons @ Laurier

Political Science Faculty Publications

Political Science

2-1-2006

Reply to Adamantia Pollis

Rhoda E. Howard-Hassmann

Wilfrid Laurier University, hassmann@wlu.ca

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholars.wlu.ca/poli_faculty

Recommended Citation

Howard-Hassmann, Rhoda E., "Reply to Adamantia Pollis" (2006). Political Science Faculty Publications. 25.

https://scholars.wlu.ca/poli_faculty/25

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Political Science at Scholars Commons @ Laurier. It has been accepted for inclusion in Political Science Faculty Publications by an authorized administrator of Scholars Commons @ Laurier. For more information, please contact scholarscommons@wlu.ca.

Reply to Adamantia Pollis

Rhoda E. Howard-Hassmann

In her commentary (August 2005) on my article, "The Second Great Transformation" (February 2005), Adamantia Pollis makes several factual errors. It is an exaggeration to say that "globalization . . . has no borders or boundaries."¹ States still exist and still enjoy sovereignty, even if that sovereignty has been partially relinquished to international treaties and organizations. Multinational corporations do not "set their own policies and rules free of any governmental constraints."² Multinationals operate under the corporate laws of the states in which they operate and negotiate with many governments. Pollis (and I) may not find corporate law sufficient to protect human rights and might wish for different negotiated outcomes, but this does not mean that multinationals operate free of constraints. It is also not true that "there are no global governmental institutions to regulate the global economy."³ One such institution is the World Trade Organization. This may not be an institution that Pollis likes, but it was established by governments to regulate some aspects of the global economy.

Pollis also confuses necessity with sufficiency. Criticizing my linkage between capitalism, democracy, and human rights, she states that there are

* Rhoda E. Howard-Hassmann is Canada Research Chair in Global Studies and Political Science at Wilfrid Laurier University and a Fellow of the Royal Society of Canada. Her books include Colonialism and Underdevelopment in Ghana (1978), Human Rights in Commonwealth Africa (1986), and Human Rights and the Search for Community (1995). She is also co-editor of An International Handbook of Human Rights (1987) and Sleeping under Bridges: Economic Rights in Canada and the United States (forthcoming, 2005). Her most recent volume, Compassionate Canadians: Civic Leaders Discuss Human Rights (2003), was named 2004 Outstanding Book by the Human Rights Section of the American Political Science Association. Her current research project is on the question of what the Western world owes Africa. Dr. Howard-Hassmann has been a Visiting Professor at four universities and has presented invited lectures at many others. She is a member of six journal editorial boards.

1. Adamantia Pollis, Commentary on the Second Great Transformation, 27 HUM. RTS. Q. 1120 (2005).
2. Id.
3. Id. at 1120–21.

no signs of democratization or human rights in China, despite its move to a market economy. Nowhere did I state that capitalism results automatically in democracy or human rights. I specifically rejected this hypothesis, arguing instead for the necessity of social mobilization, class action, and human agency to bring about democracy in capitalist societies.⁴ I specifically noted that while there can be no democracy without capitalism, there can certainly be capitalism without democracy.⁵ In any case, if one wishes to assess my ideal-type “positive model” against reality, then one might wish to consider whether human beings in China are exercising their capacity for agency. China’s most senior police official, Zhou Yong-kang, was recently reported to have said that there were 74,000 protests in his country in 2004, involving 3.7 million people; this number had risen from 10,000 protests in 1994 and 58,000 in 2003.⁶ This is precisely the kind of social mobilization to which I refer in my article.

I am saddened to learn that Adamantia Pollis has misread my article. I presented both positive and negative theoretical models of possible outcomes of globalization. Both of these models are very complex. I rejected both simplistic “positive” and simplistic “negative” models of the relationship between globalization and human rights. I did suggest that the development of international human rights law and international human rights social movements might influence the world in a positive direction. This is surely what we, as human rights scholars, are all hoping and striving for.

4. Rhoda H. Howard-Hassmann, The Second Great Transformation: Human Rights Leapfrogging in the Era of Globalization, 27 HUM. RTS. Q. 1, 25 (2005).

5. Id. at 26.

6. ECONOMIST, 1 Oct. 2005, at 38.