8-8-2017

Three poems

Madison P. Jones IV
University of Florida

Part of the Nature and Society Relations Commons, Place and Environment Commons, and the Poetry Commons

Follow this and additional works at / Suivez-nous ainsi que d’autres travaux et œuvres: https://scholars.wlu.ca/thegoose

Recommended Citation / Citation recommandée Jones, Madison P. "Three poems." The Goose, vol. 16, no. 1, article 23, 2017, https://scholars.wlu.ca/thegoose/vol16/iss1/23.

This article is brought to you for free and open access by Scholars Commons @ Laurier. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Goose by an authorized editor of Scholars Commons @ Laurier. For more information, please contact scholarscommons@wlu.ca. Cet article vous est accessible gratuitement et en libre accès grâce à Scholars Commons @ Laurier. Le texte a été approuvé pour faire partie intégrante de la revue The Goose par un rédacteur autorisé de Scholars Commons @ Laurier. Pour de plus amples informations, contactez scholarscommons@wlu.ca.
Losing the Dog

“Is you got the dog?” —The blues man

When he darts through the open door, into retreating darkness after the yearling raccoon, the one we’d seen the week before on an evening walk, I am filled with regret, remembering all those times he’s done this, how in ten years and three towns, he must have disappeared a hundred times. I go back to that morning I hung on the phone, feeling the distance of my commute, looking out at the abandoned factory town, watching light begin off the fallen bricks of those landscapes always ruined or reborn. That same relief when you told me he was home again. But down here the traffic’s bad. In an hour, the commuters will fill 8th Ave. Picturing them, bleary and racing to work, has me slamming the car door and rounding the bend, breathless as mid-tour de stade. The way his name hung like dirt in my throat all that morning on the farm. The barbed-wire fence we spent hours mending after the neighbors called to say the cows broke free and were loose on Highway 431. He disappeared between the horseshoe nail and the hammer song, like a rabbit shadow in tall grass, ten feet away but camouflaged and still as death, waiting for us to move on, to forget him like a rifle report forgets the bowl-resonant field. The times he broke out and came to find me at the library across town where I worked in the afternoons, crouching in the bush for an open door to slip through and surprise me at the front desk. Or when he started sleeping on your front porch, before we were married or had barely met. Down the hill, as shortleaf sunlight turns like a screw through the trees, to find him waiting by the curb in expectation.
When the Owls Came

I blamed them for my sleeplessness.

Wading in shallow moonlight, I pleaded for silence

to tuck me in mindless wool.

When they left,
I understood the company of nocturne.
January Nocturne

And out beyond the fence line, the world is growing dark as some painted window hung in the trees above us, shuttering around where we lie together, turning our words in the low light, remembering voices and faces, the blood moon over the pasture, tadpoles in the swollen spring, shadows of conversation and firelight, frozen mornings when the air seemed to move straight through the walls of our little cabin after the embers in the woodstove had burned low.
What we can recall we never know again, though we can remember that pleasure moving through us, empty as clouds in the night sky—ingching past at such a distance, and nearby, how soon to disappear.

MADISON JONES is a graduate research fellow at the University of Florida, working on a doctorate focused on place writing and environmental rhetoric. Reflections on the Dark Water, his second poetry collection, was released in 2016 (Solomon & George). Recent poems have He coedited Writing the Environment in Nineteenth-Century American Literature (Lexington, 2015). His articles have appeared or are forthcoming in ISLE, Kairos, and Merwin Studies, and he has reviewed for Kenyon Review Online, The Journal, and storySouth, among others. Visit his