A Graph of the Wind

Sid Marty
A Graph of the Wind

See how this great bull pine leans to the east, silver branches twisting to the rising sun, bent away from the fury of the west.

It sways, in its arrested turning, like an old woman, playing the spoons to a slow dance step, centuries long, with wooden limbs gouged out and polished by particles of sandstone in moving rivers of wind.

Bleached fingers click together.
Long nails trace
a graph of the wind
on the blueprint of sky.

The wind drops to gather itself.

Trouble can be quiet as you stand in its eye, thinking your little thoughts, but the eye can blink and drown you.

Centuries ago
a hunter stood where you stand now.

Here is a piece of chert, the size of a guitar pick; in practiced hands it could flense a deer.
The edge still sharp after a thousand years!

That hunter saw the ridge stretched out like a tawny goddess, carved by a chisel of ice in the days when the sun fell asleep.
The deer are feeding in the pines that robe her curved shoulders.

We live now in our levelheaded houses, but these great undulations will dance at noon, like Magi loosed from the sun’s bright lamp.

Trouble moves and bends the trees to a northeast permanence; a sign.
Trouble is the wind.

Down a long hall of air you are allowed to see: a white house
a horse, a yellow bus, two figures moving through the grass in a familiar way, voices you can almost hear.

In this hour of calm you are given a chance to move away from here, but you close your hand on the ancient knife and it pricks you, to blood memory.

So now a wave comes, far off and westward. A bending, a shadow;
a song.

SID MARTY is the author of five books of poetry and five books of nonfiction. He resigned his position as a park warden in the Rockies in 1978 to begin a career as a full-time writer, poet, and singer-songwriter. He is known as an environmental activist and an advocate for national parks. He and his wife, Myrna, live at the foot of the Livingstone Range near the Crowsnest Pass in southwestern Alberta.