The Moon

The truth of the matter is
the moon
No matter night or day
the moon
My whole life’s dog
and the powdered-milk moon

I walk the dark streets
hooded and cold
while the night throws off its clothes

The almost-full moon sways
a baby on her flattened left hip

Stars shine and vanish
like ink birds on ancient Chinese scrolls

If he loves me
the moon—
and the moon even if he doesn’t

Walk to buy wine
the dog’s eyes silvering moons

The earth floats, an overfull bowl
on a black sea and the moon sways her babe to sleep

I walk fast, walk as a woman does walking in twilight with only the moon

Violence is always possible in the moon of the mind
and love is all the light in the world and darkness, nonetheless, getting in

I return under the moon’s lopsided belly
her slow sashay along the Milky Way
Paws as big as snowshoes, the polar bears dance

after the photograph Polar pas de deux by Eilo Elvinger

in pas de deux—we are graceful, slow; on one leg with attitude.

When ice pierces padded foot
I bounce, curse, face glacier’s glare

and when slush covers solid ground
I jump cabriole, like a goat on slick ice.

And you, cub,
a single beat behind, leap, then

reach with your paws en pointe (those sharp dark nails) and rise—

the sun is low, winter cold brings sleepy eyes—you perform glissade

feet in first position, raised, relevé
to den, you tuck to me like a roll of winter fat,

and bow, reverence, to sleep.
Overheard Conversation with Self

Ugh. There is no cream.

Cream is the wise thought that gets thinned down by my phone.

Fuck the phone. The dog. What does he want anyway?
(The dog is my inner self hankering for affection.)

What am I even doing today? Obviously there is a plan written in a book in my not-so-neat hand.

If A and I are Vancouver Island Girls, which one of us is the bear, which one the flapper?

There is no plan. Seriously. What if I don’t live as long as I need to.

In Vernon I’d shoot off on compass points—head for the hills above (north maybe) or ahead (south?). I’d fast-walk for an hour. Land at a dog park with no dog of my own so no sense of belonging.

Who belongs? My students debated this last night. Elusive. The dogs barked at me; they knew I didn’t.

What am I doing? We discussed how place roots in us, or people. I should. I should. I should, but probably I’ll just have a shower.

It’s weird to meet an old neighbour in the mall and she says—you don’t actually go to a job? And I say, I work from home.

You can see she envies this even though retired. You can see she’s skeptical no matter how often I say “teach” “write” “edit” she’s picturing bonbons and god knows, orgies. She’s thinking no job.

I say—flexible for my son. She kind of half shrugs. I go and buy chocolates.

They aren’t for me. This is “Yvonne” she’s the “poet”—
I don’t want other people’s memes in my head. What’s a meme anyway?

I’d ask my phone but fuck my phone. I’ll just wonder for a while.

I’m just purple-inking the page. Smoker’s coughing. I’m just nail biting.
Picking at callouses. Tearing a hole in my favourite jeans.

My coffee is always cold. I’m just wood-pecking at thin treated boards.
Shedding for future bird’s nests. Chewing my own arm bone.

I’m just grinding my tongue between my teeth.
Sad Sonnet with Extra Couplet

Sad simple sonnet
I do not want to write you—
scrap paper with bird scat on it.
Silence is a plucked duck and a screwed
world of stink and yellow skunk weeds.
April a month to love or die doing it.
Wind-blown hair, tangled reeds,
mud trails, tramped voles and biting ticks:
sad all year, we are sadder yet here—
April—what hungers, what sprouts to grow
every scented thing from last year,
damp from a winter of whine and woe.
Crucified trees show beauty’s hunger:
a river cut off where the dead slumber.

Ah, but a sonnet must have a turn.
Not to worry, everything here will burn.
Occupare—

to take possession of

Heretics, we tore what had been made over millennia and paved over cycads, staghorn fern, horsetail. Molten lava cooled and we shaped it to our needs. A thousand-year-old tortoise pokes its head above the water in a pond in a city. An abandoned castle floats on an island in this pond. The pond is the center of a city that has seen war, was made during war. In the tortoise, a god was found. A statue made. A story told. Then we feasted on it. Asps circled our ankles. The hinges on the doors rusted in place. We banned automatic guns but used explosives to tunnel and bridge. Watersheds faltered and failed. We travelled faster to the last butterfly tree, the last three-toed sloth and pangolin. We brought bats home, flapped their weakened wings. Made the fruit bat sleep on our down pillows and silk sheets. Yeast rises in the creases of our elbows and our knees. Music plays. We only hear the song of bird song after we’ve turned birds into hats, and gloves of bright blue; boots feathered. The alleys we’ve built are long and dark. We are wretched and gleeful in our overwrought thoughts, shooting pellets like golf balls at the sun. Millions of species. Millions of deaths. Great, we occupy the space we take, we shoot, we shoot again. Snow in our nostrils and fire in our wake we eat our meals peppered with Hades’ breath.
