glove

lies on the sidewalk, sodden black thumb folded in to rest on the palm open to the sky and rain, calm in its dereliction, all fingers slack and swollen, tubular, intended to protect against the bite of frost with fake leather, fuzzy and soft and man-made, near splendid with decorative stitches and dots – some man's hefty right hand now somewhere naked, withstands the cold, its owner's thoughts on the lost one: the trouble with loss is what's left behind, so he throws the left one to the discarded clothes but finally even from there it's tossed
