Elegy for water and ourselves

Water the colour of the sky on a kind day we celebrate. Water the rose opaque of smoke when there are forest fires we regard with caution and may secretly admire.

Water the hue of puce clouds in the gloom of wet weather; water the colour of the raw earth it travels through in river arteries and veins visited by the green populations that make it their summer home we might ignore. Water travelling our arteries past rocks and waterfalls or back up the blue estuaries to enter the heart’s valves and its chambers. Water is our medium: without it there is no life, no movement towards or away. Water is our source crystal as first lakes; ammonia tasting today in silver taps or at its most elemental drinking through the long throat of a cool well on a hot day: but water is all colours and every well has its own taste and darkness, and each district’s weakness reflects our own sewage effluent or agricultural run off, pesticides or Roundup iron or mercury, arsenic slurry or PCB tailings from the mines, a rainbow slick on the water’s mirror from the metal shunt carrying black blood under a major river artery. All we have consumed, antibiotics last Wednesday or estrogen in pills a decade ago, insulin daily or ephedrine seasonally, Prozac or Red Bull that have travelled through our bodies, and been rejected subsumed in the lagoon of liver and kidney, returns to the water that feeds us, muddying or complicating altering its essence: our essence. And so water that is our life may be our destruction, and we are our own destroyers.

GILLIAN HARDING-RUSSELL has written three poetry collections and five chapbooks. In the fall of 2016, a sequence of her poems entitled Making sense won Exile’s Gwendolyn MacEwen chapbook award, and her chapbook Foxlove came out in the Alfred Gustav chapbook series.
