The Eau Claire Log Drivers: 1887

Rain blackens the limestone peaks pouring down the backbone of the earth streaking down, needle to bough to ground and over the green bearberry leaves into depressions, overflowing down waterlines of brooks, to creeks to the Kananaskis

On the Eau Claire drive nine men were crossing above the falls sleepy in the morning chill

The river was a road to work they knew; except on a sunny day they'd forgotten yesterday's rain still swelling to flood

Maybe an oar broke against a sweeper or late-night whiskey in the brain, made weak the oarsmen, when a backwater rip spun them astern and they'd only time to turn her straight downstream

At the first falls they took on water At the second they took on more At the third, the boat went under Six men thrown out were crushed against the cliff in a crimson melee

Three survivors surfaced in the clear shaking alive in the glacial cold

Five bodies the river gave up The sixth? His bones are buried under the silt of the reservoir that now backs up the power of both sun and cloud and turns lights on in city streets or music on lonely farms

And Kananaskis Falls is now an underwater memory that trout swim through

Where rusted peavey blades and logging chains are bracelets round some gleaming bones

They waved those peaveys bravely, proudly once, shining in the sun

Until the river, jealous of all that glimmers pulled them down its winding stairs
